With the rise of managed health care, which emphasises cost-efficiency and brevity, mental health professionals have had to confront this burning question: How can they help clients (16) derive the greatest possible benefit for a better mental health from treatment in the shortest amount of time?

Recent evidence suggests that a promising approach is to complement psychological counselling with additional activities that are not too taxing for clients yet (17) give significant results. One such activity is the practice of gratitude. Indeed, many studies over the past (18) decade have found that people who consciously count their blessings tend to be happier and less depressed.

However, most research studies on gratitude have been conducted with well-functioning people. Hence, three hundred participants who were seeking counselling for issues related to depression and anxiety were (19) recruited.

Among the participants, those who wrote gratitude letters reported

(20) significantly better mental health between four and twelve weeks after their writing exercise ended as compared to those who wrote about negative experiences or only received counselling. This suggests that practising gratitude on top of receiving psychological counselling carries greater benefits than counselling alone, even when that gratitude practice is brief.

"Although I am not very good at dancing, I love the variety of art forms that I was exposed to since Ms Milles led an intensive session of acting and dancing through songs (using Les Miserables theme songs) in her workshops. I was quite sceptical to join this workshop at first. I really did not think that I would be able to learn so much. I underestimated what this online workshop could offer. I had so much fun. | Koalas in the wild may be placed on the danger list after a plunge in their population in |

| destruction of their habitat and changes in the climate. |
| According (53) the local media, the Australian Minister for the |

| Research done in a koala habitat near Sydney (57) shown that |

When I was young, my family lived in a dilapidated wooden house on the outskirts of Limbang, a small town in Northern Sarawak, Malaysia. It stood on wooden stilts and had a steep sloping roof of corrugated zinc sheets which made the ramshackle house very hot in the day. The tiny collection of rooms inside could barely contain all my family - Father, Mother and eleven children.

I was the second eldest. My siblings and I often ran about and when we got too boisterous, the whole house shook. "The house is going to collapse!" my mother would vell at us.

We seemed to live in perpetual darkness. The nearby trees formed a dense canopy. They blocked out much of the sunlight during the day. The nights were always a brooding, foreboding time. That was the 1950s and early 1960s, and we used kerosene lamps which gave only dim light. The gloom was made worse by the superstitious fears Mother passed on to us. Raised in a traditional Chinese family where ancestor worship was practised, we believed in ghosts and malevolent wandering spirits.

As little children, we were sometimes just afraid of the dark and Mother would ask in a voice tinged with fear, "Why are you so afraid? What do you see?" Although we saw nothing, her questions made us even more frightened. They aroused in us feelings of apprehension and phobia. To me, there was nothing more terrifying than the prospect of meeting a ghost.

Our friends, probably afraid of the dark, creepy appearance of the house, rarely came over to play. I once overheard one of my relatives telling her children that our house was haunted. This did not affect us one bit. We had fun playing Hide-And-Seek around the house. The walls were splendid for climbing — the overlapping horizontal planks provided excellent toeholds. We scaled the walls to our 'hideouts' to get away from the seeker.

By the time I was a teenager, my superstitious fears had been replaced by feelings of discontent and anger. I envied all my friends. They had nicer homes with proper plumbing. We did not even have a toilet! Instead, we used chamber pots. If friends dropped by unexpectedly before the chamber pots had been emptied, I would be overcome with shame. Although most of the time they were hidden away in the bedrooms, I was sure my friends could smell them. After school, I would walk home in a different direction, diving my friends the impression that I lived near their street where the houses were nicer.

When I was thirteen, I sprained my ankle at school and my principal, a Canadian named Mr Spark, drove me home. We arrived just in time to see my younger sister, Siok Kiat, at the stream. She was emptying a chamber pot. This last scene unfolded in painfully slow motion. I wished I was somewhere else at that | moment. I felt ashamed. Although he did not say anything, I imagined him thinking, "What an unhygienic and uncivilised family!" | 40 | | | | | | | | |

|---|------|--|--|--|--|--|--|--|--|
| I admit that life was not always terrible. My sisters, brothers and I enjoyed playing *Rounders and football in the big grass field in the centre of the town. At dusk, we would reluctantly return home. We also spent many exciting hours challenging one another when we played *Five Stones. When I was in my mid-teens, we had electricity. A fluorescent tube lit the living room and the bedrooms and the kitchen each had a light bulb. Still, I could see nothing much to cherish about my home. To me, it was ugly and rotten - an eyesore. | | | | | | | | | |
| Then, when I was sixteen, some teachers from my school came to visit. We were celebrating Chinese New Year, and as was the custom of many Sarawakians, we had an open house. By this time most of my teachers, especially my Art teacher, Mr Ho, knew that I was extremely embarrassed to tell people where I lived. He devised a plan to change my perspective. | | | | | | | | | |
| As Mr Ho entered the house, he said, "Siok Hong, your home is situated in such a beautiful setting. I had to stop and admire It from the road. All those trees forming the backdrop make it look picturesque." | | | | | | | | | |
| Suddenly, I saw my house in a different light. From Mr Ho's artistic point of view, it was as though my house had magically transformed itself into this majestic and magnificent abode in the midst of an enchanting woodland. It was something I had not thought of before. | | | | | | | | | |
