The Internet can be a dangerous neighbourhood for children and teens. From cyber predators to social media posts that can come back to torment them later in life, the dangers can be frightening. Children may also unwittingly subject their families to online risks. For example, they might accidentally download malware that could give cyber criminals access to their parents' bank account or other private information. Protecting children on the Internet is first and foremost a matter of awareness—knowing what dangers lurk and how to safeguard against them.

Humble Beginnings

Sewing has been a hobby of best friends, Avery Pan and Sheena Chong, ever since they were at school together. Mrs Janet Tan, their Primary 2 Art teacher, taught them basic skills. With her guidance, they each finished sewing a pencil case. After that, they borrowed library books that showed them how to sew other items, and spent their free time sewing together. In their teenage years, they were sewing bags and clothes for themselves!

Avery and Sheena's friends noticed that the girls were always wearing unique and trendy clothes. When they found out that Avery and Sheena's clothes were homemade, they were amazed and wanted the girls to sew clothes for them too! Encouraged by their friends' support, Avery and Sheena decided to turn their hobby into a business. They were the first to set up a stall on Talent Lane every weekend.

After merely a year, the craft fair now showcases more than 50 stalls selling a wide variety of handmade crafts such as clothes, bags, fashion accessories and homeware.

As soon as _____

In October, I told the eight-year-olds in the class I teach in New Jersey about my plan. "I have a project for all of you. I'd like all of you to save some of your pocket money," I said. "Then, we'll buy food for a Thanksgiving dinner for someone who might not have a nice dinner otherwise."

I wanted the children to experience that it is more blessed to give than to receive. I hoped they could experience a sense of their own power to effect change. 5

Early in the Thanksgiving week, the boys and girls arrived in class clutching their savings. Now, they could not wait to go shopping. I decided to take them to the supermarket as I wanted them to decide on their own what to get for the person whom we were going to help. 10

I supervised while they darted up and down the supermarket aisles. With a smile on their faces, they ran to the checkout counter, pushing a cart filled with turkey and all the trimmings. Then, someone spotted a "necessity" that sent them racing.

"Flowers!" Kristine cried. The group hurtled toward the plants.

I reminded the children to be practical. It is an important value for them to remember. After all, it was more sensible to use any extra money to buy essential items that could be stretched into meals. Pointing at the trays of eggs and boxes of cereal that lined the shelves, I pronounced, "You can't eat flowers. Please place the flowers back. Buy those instead." 15

"But Mrs. Sherlock," came the resounding wail from the class, "we want them. She'll like this one." The rest of the children nodded in agreement. After much persuasion from the children, I agreed to the buying of flowers. 20

An agency had given us the name and address of Helen. She had lived alone for many years. Soon, we were bouncing along a rutted road to her house. The atmosphere on the bus was definitely not what I had imagined. "You're squishing me!" one voice announced. "I think I'm scared of strangers," said another. Some of the children expressed their worry about not being able to put a smile on Helen's face 25

We finally pulled up in front of a small wooden house tucked in the woods. A slightly built woman with a weary face came to the door to welcome us. My little group scurried to get the food. As each box was carried in, Helen oohed and aahed—much to her visitors' pleasure. When one of the children placed the flowers on the counter, the woman seemed surprised. She's wishing it was a bag of flour, I thought, so I apologised to Helen on behalf of the children before leaving the house. 30

We returned to the bus. We could see the kitchen window from the bus. Helen waved goodbye, then she turned and walked past the turkey, past the trimmings, straight to the daisies. She put her face in their petals. She smiled, then she gave a bow. She was transformed before our eyes. 35

The children were quiet. Then slowly, one by one came forward and whispered words of gratitude into my ear. In that one brief moment, they had seen for themselves the power they possessed to make another's life better. They were thankful that I had allowed them to experience something so beautiful and meaningful. And I had seen something too. This wonder had been formed not by adult practicality but by youthful exuberance. The children had sensed that sometimes a person needs a pot of funny flowers on a dark November day. 40
